[Mr. Bacon's Speech concluded.] The gentleman's address had to me a meaning most solemn and portentous, taken in connexion with the times and circumstances under which it was delivered. But what are the mighty means by which this crisis is to be produced, and what is the powerful lever by which these commotions are to be raised—the old stale topic of a perpetual embargo-like the gentleman from Virginia, I nauseate the subject.-The idea of a permanent embargo is worn out, and I thought had by this time been discarded from the mind of every man both in this House and in the nation. I am not about to enter upon a wire-drawn argument to shew either from the particular terms of the law or the general construction of language whether it is so or not .-These views have been long since exhausted. What then are the new arguments never before produced which are now offered by the gentleman to prove that such must | tended for defence against foreign aggreshave been the original policy of the law ?-It is that it was recommended by the Exccutive as a precautionary measure, while it was supported by some members on this ! floor as a coercive one. On this point let me bring to the notice of the gentleman the temporary embargo of 1794, recommended as I have always understood, by General Washington, and held out to foreign nations as a mere measure of precaution, to secure our vessels and our merchandize from belligerent aggressions and plunder. But how was it supported in this House? It was supported as the present law has also sometimes been, as a measure of coercive policy. We have but few of the debates which took place on the former occasion, to revert to, but I have in my hand the speech of a gentleman of distinguished talents, and a predecessor of mine, who then had a seat in this House, giving his views of that measure- Mr. Bacon here read the following paragraph from the speech of Mr. Sedgwick on his introducing a resolution empowering the President to lay an embargo on the 12th day of March, 1794.]

" The reasons on which this idea of an embargo were founded, are that Great-Britain cannot supply her West-Indies, except from the United States; if this is in any degree true in peaceable times, how much more forcibly must it operate now. They have a considerable military force there to feed; in truth, without supplies from this country they must inevitably abandon a project, with them a favorable one, the conquest of the French West-Indies-in this situation of affairs he believed it would be found proper to put into the hands of the President a power to lay this embargo; and in a moment to prevent all supplies going to the West-Indies." The sentiments (continued Mr. B.) here advanced) prove that the idea of an embargo in this country being considered as a measure of coercive policy in respect to foreign nations, to Great-Britain in particular, is not a novel one—that it is no fanciful notion of the present day, but owes its origin to the politicians of the old school .-I have introduced them however more particularly to shew, that the auspices under which this measure of embargo was introduced and recommended to the nation, and the views with which it was supported, were the same now as in 1794—that they were both precautionary and coerciveand will the gentleman say, that President | and those would be but poor defenders of Washington or the Congress of 1794, were, as he asserts we are, instrumental in deceiving the nation, and yet his argument will equally apply to both cases.

neglect in providing general efficient means of hostility as a certain indication that we have no idea of interposing any other measures of resistance to the violations of our rights than the embargo, and says that we have not even sufficient spirit to fit out our little navy. On this head I can answer only for one, and can say with truth, that I have always been ready, at least to an e- to the house an opinion that in the present support to every measure either of defence or offence which has been proposed to us. As to the navy, every one knows that it has not been any thing like a party question, and that the two political parties which usually appear in this house have been nearly equally divided upon it. The fact is, that the apparent tardiness of our proceeding on this point has been occasioned more by a difference of opinion as to what were the most appropriate means of national defence, than by any doubt whether the essential rights of the nation should be defended in that mode which should ultimately be thought to be upon the whole the most expedient and efficient. Another consideration has undoubtedly had its influence ia deterring the government from launching into those extensive measures of hostile preparation which have perhaps been too long delayed. There can be no question that the most ardent desire of the government has been for the preservation of peace if it could in any consistence with the national rights and honor be preserved, and in proportion as their desire has been ardent, no doubt we have flattered ourselves with the expectation that it might yet be preserved. Perhaps this reliance has already been cherished too longand as the storm thickens around us and the political horizon assumes a more threatening aspect, we are now progressing more rapidly in the preparations for a system different from that system which has until this time been pursued, and in this work we may very properly call upon gentlemen of all political parties to unite their efforts, and contribute whatever they can to the defence of their country. It is said that the army which was provided for at our last session has been organized upon party principles, and officered generally from one political sect, and that such an army cannot be insions, but must be solely for domestic purposes. As to the fact which the gentleman mentions, I know nothing about it. For myself I can truly say, that on the subject of appointments to office generally in a government like ours, my general opinions have heretofore been more liberal than would probably be esteemed orthodox by almost any political party in this country, certainly much more so than was practised upon by the political friends of my colleague when they presided in our public councils. As there are certainly a great number of men who differ from the present majority in their political sentiments, upon whom I could place the utmost reliance if called to defend their country, I would never consent that the single sin of federalism should be deemed sufficient to exclude them from all participation in either civil or military offices. But if the gentleman in one part of his speech yesterday intended to give us a sample of those men in whose behalf he complained on account of their exclusion from military commands, it is certainly no subject of my regret that such exclusion has been thought proper by the head of that department. Sir, was it a patriotic effort on the part of the gentleman to endeavor in that public manner to chill the spirit of the nation, and to discourage them from the assertion of their just rights, by disparaging our resources, undervaluing our means of annoyance to our enemies, and proclaiming in the face of the world our vulnerable points and most defenceless positions; and at the same time magnifying the power of a loreign nation, and declaring that she held against us those pledges for our good behavior which we could not put at risk without the most imminent hazard and destruction to ourselves? Sir, when I heard the gentleman avowing to the world sentiments of this sort, my heart sunk within me, especially when I saw full in his eye a proteg of the minister of his Britannic majesty rioting no doubt upon the charms of his eloquence, and receiving it with those kind of sensations so natural to the human heart, when the pride of the country to whose fortunes we are attached is the subject of eulogy. I trust that these are not the national feelings or sentiments of the great body of those with whom the gentleman is generally associated in his political conduct. If they are, they could indeed hardly be relied upon to lead our armies to the field of battletheir country, who declared at the outset that it was utterly incapable of defence. We are pressed by the gentleman to answer, why, if we have any intention of de-But the gentleman affects to consider our fending our rights by any other means than the embargo, we do not now give a pledge to the nation of our intention to abandon it at some limited period, and resort to some other system if justice is not previously done us. This is perhaps a reasonable question, and I feel for my own part no hesitation in answering it. It is probably recollected that I had some time since declared qual extent with my colleague, to lend my circumstances of the country it was the duty of the government to fix upon a definite period beyond which an adherence to our present position should not be maintained, and with that view I moved at that time that the resolution for repealing the embargo laws which had been moved in the early part of the session by a gentleman from Vermont should be referred to the committee of the whole who had under consideration the subject of a non-intercourse with G. Britain and France, with a view that it might be considered in connection with that or some other measure as a substitute upon its removal. In that motion, however, I met with but little encouragement on any side of the house. It would perhaps be desirable that the proposition for limiting the continuance of our present system should come from some other quarter-but if it should not, I shall feel no hesitation in offering it at an early day, and placing the time of it at no very distant period. If there were no other considerations in favor of such a measure, it is perhaps due to the feelings of that portion of our citizens who by such addresses to their passions and their prejudices as we vesterday heard from my colleague have been induced to believe, that that this was a system of perpetual exclusion from the ocean, and a permanent abandonment of commercial enterprize, and who acting under that palpable delusion may by the artifices of desperate partisans, and designing leaders, be led into acts of insubordination, and involved in crimes, which under the influence of correct information they would deprecate and shudder at. Tho' it is more especially the province of my colleague to consider seriously upon whose head the blood of such of our fellow citizens may in a good measure rest; yet I feel it a duty to do what lies in my power to undeceive them. In the furtherance of this desirable object, I have reason to beheve that a large majority of the house will unite, and having done this I will consent to do no more. Let the crisis talked of by the gentleman come when it will it is our duty to meet it; let its consequences rest upon thoseby whose misrepresentations & instigations it has been promoted and encouraged. [Debate tobe continued.]

Extract from a privte letter. "The letters received by your house here, from your correspondents at Mahon, contain the following advices: You need not now expect the 5000 English who were coming from Sicily, since they received orders, on the voyage, to put back, in consequence of the Neapolitans having applied for their assistance to shake off the yoke of the French. He adds, that the Spanish consul at St. Pedro directed him to communicate this intelligence on his arrival in Spain."

The following is the translation of a curious and most important Commission to Don F. Palafox, brother to the celebrated General, a member of the Central Junta, constituting him after the manner of the French in the outset of their career, a Commissioner over their Generals, with powers of the most extraordinary kind. We read this paper with great concern, because it betrays an impatience that may hurry the Commanders into indiscretion.

"The Supreme Junta is convinced of the absolute necessity of our armics putting themselves in motion against those of the enemy, which are causing so great evils in the Spanish territory. It is said that all the democratic members of congress, from the eastern states, have expressed their abborrence and indignation at the appearance of such sentiments in a paper avowedly under the patronage and influence of the administration.

FROM THE MONITOR. "THE LAST RESOURCE.

"The times have changed, and we must thinge with them. Circumstances alter cases, and there is a period in the affairs of men, when a change becomes a duty, and no mark of infamy can be attached to a conduct which is wisely calculated to save ourselves, and our devoted country from absolate rain and degradation. It now evidently appears, beyond all contradiction, that a treasonable conspiracy has, and does exist against the constitution and indivisibility of the American republic. The majority of the members of the eastern delegation in congress, have openly asserted, that no laws passed by the general government, will be deemed obligatory by their constituents, if they should interfere with their local pursuits and advantages. They publicly consider the embargo law as a dead letter, and as Mr. Tahmadge was pleased to express it in the house of representatives on Thursday last, "the funeral is gone by." The doctrine from these gentlemen is invariably the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. The cry among them is, why arm? Who is the enemy? And, with whom go to war? In the mournful expressions which were made by the middle and southern states on the murder of Pierce, and the murder of our brethren on board the Chesapeake, there were no signs of disapprobation, no marks of sympathy evidenced by the people of the east; and they have so far sold themselves for English gold, and Enghish traffic, as to become the open abettors & friends of that vile and corruptible and corrupting nation, England.

The genius of America weeps at the sad spectacle! and the departed spirits of heroes and martyrs are ready to exclaim -ah, ungrateful people of New England! was it for this your southern brethren fought your battles and relieved your distress? was it for this so much blood and treasure have ben spilt in vain. Perfidious race of mortals! ye were the first that brought war upon the fand, and ye are the first to disgrace our country by returning to your old tyrannical master George the third. What is to be done? Why, I will, in a few words tell you, what men must do, when placed between two evils—we must now either turn traitors also and side with England or accommodate matters with France. I candidly give you my choice with the latter, for the following substantial reasons. First from motives of gratitude, for without the aid which we received from France we could never have obtained our independence or become a nation. Secondly, because France has done us but slight injury in comparison with England-France has neither murdered our citizens nor impressed our seamen. France, provided we will heartily and bona fide co-operate against Engiand, then France will, at once agree to revoke her edicts and make us ample reparation for the losses we have sustained by her cruizers. France will aid us not only with her councils, but she will essentially aid us in the supply of arms, and a suitable train of artillery. She will also aid us, if required, with some of her best officers and skilful engineers. As the crisis now is, this is the only rational choice we can make; and since the people of New England, at least on the seaboard, have turned out so base as to become tributary to old England, let the people of the middle and southern states accept of the aid of the French nation. This determination will at once make a change over the face of the world, in favor of suffering humanity. It will enable the emperor of the French to renew his plan of invasion against England. It will soon lower the tone of that haughty nation. What we offer is fair and above board, and not like traitors who have assassinated our liberties in the dark, by uniting with our deadliest foe. But such underhanded work has always been the mode of operation with Englishmen. It is not confined, such a conduct, to their subjects only, but to their kings. For the prostituted Charles 2d, after his restoration, consented to become a pensioner, while, at the same time, he was the nominal king of England. The saints of New England are willing to be attached to the union, so far as it will promote their advantage, but at the same time to be the VASSALS of George the 3d, on any terms that will benefit their interest, however contrary to principle, honor, or national independence.
